bell-glass filled with dry air, and placed at contact distance of its poles from a metallic column terminating above in a metallic head, and below in a conductor that has its origin outside of the bell-glass. Above the column, at a given distance from it, there is a curved rod in contact with one of the poles of an electrical machine, the other pole being grounded. The bell-glass has a scale at the height of the needle. When it is desired to measure the conductivity of a substance, the apparatus is so arranged that both pivot and column are placed in the plane of the magnetic meridian; the needle will then be in contact with the metallic head, and if the latter receives electricity, it will transmit it to the former. The body under consideration is placed between the head and the curved rod, and the circuit is closed. A deviation of the needle will ensue with more or less rapidly and greater or lesser extent, according to the conductivity of the substance. [L., 87 (a, 27).]

DIGITALIN, n. Di²j'it-a²-i²n. Lat., digitalinum, digitalina [Fr. Cod.]. Fr., digitaline (amorphe [Fr. Cod.]). Ger., D. The active principle of Digitalis purpurea; an amorphous white or yellowish-white body occurring as a powder or in the form of porous masses or scales; intensely bitter, soluble in alcohol, almost insoluble in water and in ether; of the Br. Ph., a preparation made by digesting for 24 hours, at a temperature of 120° F., 40 oz. of digitalis-leaves in coarse powder in a gallon of rectified spirit of 0.838, putting them into a percolator, and, when the tincture has ceased to drop, pouring a gallon of spirit on the contents of the percolator and allowing it to percolate through slowly, distilling off the greater part of the spirit from the tincture, and evaporating the remainder over a water-bath until the whole of the alcohol has been dissipated, mixing the residual extract with 5 oz. of distilled water, to which ½ oz. of acetic acid has been previously added, and digesting this solution with ½ oz. of purified animal charcoal, filtering and diluting the filtrate with distilled water until it measures a pint, then adding ammonia-water nearly to neutralization, and afterward 160 gr. of tannic acid dissolved in 3 oz. of distilled water, washing the precipitate that will be formed with a little distilled water, rubbing it in a mortar with a small quantity of the spirit and ½ oz. of lead oxide, placing the mixture in a flask, and adding to it 4 oz. of the spirit, raising the temperature to 160° F., and keeping it at this point for about an hour, then adding ½ oz. of purified animal charcoal, putting it on a filter and evaporating the spirit by the heat of a water-bath, and finally washing the residue repeatedly with pure ether. The process of the U. S. Ph., 1870, was nearly identical with that of the Br. Ph. The digitaline amorphe of the Fr. Cod. is made by exhausting by displacement 1,000 grammes of the leaves of Digitalis purpurea with a quantity of distilled water sufficient to make 3 litres of fluid of a minimum density of 1.050, mixing this liquid with 250 grammes of solution of lead subacetate, filtering the precipitate, mixing the product first with 40 grammes of crystallized sodium carbonate, and afterward with 20 grammes of ammoniacal sodium carbonate, filtering again and precipitating by the addition of an aqueous solution of 40 grammes of tannic acid, collecting the precipitate on a filter, and mixing it with 25 grammes of powdered lead oxide and 50 grammes of purified animal charcoal, and exhausting with 90-per-cent. alcohol, evaporating on a water-bath to dryness, exhausting the residue with distilled water, exhausting again with 90-per-cent. alcohol, evaporating the alcoholic solution, and exhausting the residue with chloroform. [B. 81, 95, 113 (a. 21).]—Crystallized d. Lat., digitalina cristallisata [Fr. Cod.]. Ph. of 1650, but introduced into modern medicinal use chiefly by Withering (1776-'79). It stimulates the action of the heart, increasing the force of its systole and prolonging its diastole. In poisonous doses it arrests the heart's action in firm systole. It is said to act like ergot on unstriated muscular fibres, producing contraction of the uterus, of the blood-vessels, etc., thus acting as a hæmostatic. It also acts as a diuretic. Its most important use is as a tonic to the heart in diseases of that organ manifested by rapid and weak action and low arterial tension, and in weakness of the heart occurring in the course of various febrile diseases. It has been considered an antipyretic, and has been recommended in scarlet fever, erysipelas, acute rheumatism (especially with cardiac complications), pulmonary inflammations, congestive hæmiorrhagia, acute delirium (especially delirium tremens), functional exophthalmic goitre, spermatorrhœa, renal dropsy, etc. It was formerly regarded as peculiarly cumulative in its action, but this view was probably erroneous. The wild plant is considered far superior to the cultivated variety in medicinal properties. [A. 286; B. 5, 18, 34, 173, 180 (a. 24).]—D. resin. See DIGITALIRESIN.—D. semen. An acute, infectious disease, characterized by the formation of a membranous, fibrinous, whitish, or grayish deposit at the seat of infection, either occupying the superficial portion of a mucous membrane or forming a membranous coating on a wound. The characteristic lesion generally affects the throat, and often the nasal passages and the larynx; occasionally the conjunctiva, the bladder, or the uterus. D. begins with high fever, which is usually of short duration, after which the predominant phenomena are depression of the vital powers, impeded respiration in laryngeal cases, and symptoms referable to the absorption of septic material from the seat of the lesion. D. is often accompanied by nephritis and is apt to be followed by various forms of motor paralysis. The laryngeal form of the disease constitutes the great majority of cases of the so-called membranous croup of children. One attack of d. confers no immunity against subsequent attacks.—Asthenic d. A condition in which, with subsidence of the pronounced symptoms of d., there may exist gradual failure of the vital forces caused by the progressive impoverishment and poisoning of the blood. Kidney complications, albuminuria, and cardiac weakness are among the symptoms. [a, 25.]—Benign d. Fr., diphthérie bénigne. Sometimes the process commences in the trachea, invading the air passages from below upward, or extending only to the larynx. The presence of a laryngo-tracheal diphtheritic membrane gives rise to symptoms of diphtheritic croup. [Billington (a, 25).]—Malignant d. D. characterized by such rapidity and intensity in the development of the local manifestations, or such overwhelming constitutional poisoning, that the typical clinical gradations of the disease are unrecognizable. Death occurs from the third to the seventh day. [Billington (a, 25).]—Nasal d. A severe form of d. which may exist alone or in connection with d. in the fauces and pharynx. The false membrane can be seen extending upward from the posterior pharyngeal wall and the nostrils are red and irritated, even if no membrane is to be seen in them. Owing to the difficulty of properly cleansing the intricate passages affected, septic absorption is apt to take place. [D, 25.]—Non-infectious d. A phlegmasia of the laryngeal or laryngo-tracheal mucous membrane. [Billington (a, 25).]—Parenchymatous d. A form of d. in which the morbid process giving rise to the false membrane affects the deep portion of the mucous membrane. ["Rev. mens. des mal. d'enfance," Feb., 1880, p. 87.]—Secondary d. The manifestation of d. in a person suffering from another disease. It usually appears only after the initial disease has run its active course, attacking those mucous membranes which have been most affected.—Superficial d. D. that does not extend deeper than the epithelium. [D, 48.]—Urinous d. Ger., Harn-Diphtherie. Pulpulent degeneration of traumatic surfaces due to contact with alkaline urine. [A, 326 (a, 21).]

Any departure from, failure in, or perversion of normal physiological action in the material constitution or functional integrity of the living organism. See Acute nephritis.—Acute specific d's [Walshe]. The infectious febrile diseases.—Addison's d. Lat., morbus Addisonii, melasma suprarenale. Fr., maladie d'Addison. Ger., Addison'sche Krankheit. It., malattia di Addison. Sp., enfermedad de Addison (ó bronceada). Syn.: bronzed-skin d. A clearly defined, constitutional d. appearing as a chronic, local inflammation of the suprarenal capsules, but really consisting in a "peculiar anæmic condition always tending toward death, which is characterized by an intense development of pigment in the cells of the rete Malpighii and in the epithelium of the mucous membrane of the mouth" [Averbeck]. The original theory that the inflammatory processes involving the adrenals with their subsequent degeneration constituted the d. per se has been modified. When there is marked enlargement of the organs and the surrounding inflammation is considerable, the semilunar ganglia and the solar plexus, with the nerves given off by them, are not infrequently found involved. Upon this has been based the assumption that morbid changes in the sympathetic system constitute the initial lesion and fundamental anatomical change upon which the subsequent symptoms are developed. The symptoms develop very gradually, the earlier ones being frequently overlooked. In a well-marked case may be observed weariness, malaise, debility, anæmia, wasting, pearly sclerotics, flabby muscles, and disordered digestion with vomiting, probably sympathetic. Pain is experienced, of more or less severity, in the hypochondria, spine, and joints. The heart impulse becomes weaker and a low anæmic murmur may be heard. The gastro-intestinal disturbances increase and diarrhoea supervenes. An occasional febrile rise may occur, but a low temperature is the rule. The skin discoloration begins at those areas of the surface of the body usually exposed to light, the changes being very gradual, from a grayish-brown even to copper-color. The palms, soles, nails, and sclerotics do not change. Post-mortem manifestations in the suprarenal capsules show these organs to be large, hard, and nodular, although sometimes unchanged in size or even atrophied. Section shows cheesy degeneration with perhaps calcification or softening. The cheesy deposits are surrounded by agglomerations of tubercular, granulative, and connective tissue. Sometimes the capsules are found to be infiltrated with carcinomatous deposits or to be the seat of fatty or waxy degeneration. Cases are cited in which the adrenals were found to have been destroyed. The changes in the blood are said to resemble those found in pernicious anæmia. A theory, hardly compatible with the total destruction of the capsules by the disease, has been advanced that the process is a chemical one, assigning a secretory function to the capsules whose morbid over-production of deleterious chemical compounds partially dissolves the blood, causes the anæmia, and precipitates the hæmoglobin, giving rise to the discoloration of the skin. The prognosis is unfavorable and the treatment only palliative. The d. was discovered in 1855 by Dr. Addison of Guy's Hospital, from whom it received its name. ELECTRICITY, n. E-le²kt-tri²s'tri²qk. Lat., electricitas (from ἤλεκτρον, amber, because of its manifestation on rubbing amber). Fr., électricité. Ger., Electricität. It., elettricità. Sp., electricidad. One of the forces of nature (sometimes termed a "fluid," and also a form of molecular movement) manifested in thunder and lightning, in the rapid induction of incandescence or combustion, attraction or repulsion, chemical decomposition, or muscular contraction, and in its conversion into mechanical force. It may be brought into action (generated) by friction or by the exposure of certain substances to the operation of certain chemical agents. One of its chief characteristics is its almost instantaneous transmissibility to any distance through the medium of a conductor. [a, 27.]—Acid e. See POSITIVE e.—Active e. See FREE e.—Animale. Lat., electricitas animalis. Fr., électricité animale. Ger., thierische Electricität. Static e. generated by friction (as of glass or some resinous body with flannel, fur, or the like); also static e. in general.—Galvanic e. See GALVANISM.—High tension e. See STATIC e.—Induced e. Fr., électricité d'induction. The e. generated in the primary or secondary coil of an induction machine. The apparatus consists of a core of soft iron or a bundle of soft-iron wire surrounded by some insulating material, around which, outside the insulating material, are wound several layers of insulated wire in the shape of a helix. This wire is termed the primary coil. Outside of this there is a sliding insulating tube around which is wound a very great length of fine insulated wire, constituting the secondary coil. The ends of the primary coil are connected with the poles of a battery, and those of the secondary coil with discharging points. The battery current passing through the primary coil converts the core for the instant into an electromagnet, which excites an induced current (running in an opposite direction to the battery-current) in the secondary coil. When the core is demagnetized by the breaking of the current, an induced current (now running in the same direction as the battery-current) is also developed in the secondary coil. Except in very large coils, the induced current is slight when the connection with the battery is broken. The making and breaking of the primary current is performed by a vibrator or some form of mechanical interrupter. Between the battery and the primary current there is usually a condenser, which aids in the rapid demagnetization of the core. The strength of the induced current may be varied by sliding the secondary coil on the core. The induced current is of high tension, and is given off in rhythmical discharges, each one corresponding to an opening or closure of the battery circuit. With the electrodes applied to the body, muscular contractions are produced in the region included between them, either directly or through the medium of their nerves. The muscles are thus strengthened and many of the good effects of active exercise are produced. Induced e., especially with very rapid interruptions, has also an anodyne action, particularly in cases of muscular pain; applied by means of a wire-brush electrode, the skin being dry, it exerts a painful action that is sometimes of service in hysterical cases. [L.]—Infuential e. The e. induced in a body whose neutral state has been disturbed by the action of either the positive or negative form existing in another body. [B.]—Positive e. Fr., électricité positive. Ger., positive Electricität. 1. Of Franklin, see VITREOUS e. 2. That variety of galvanic e. which is given off from the non-decomposable element of a battery (e. g., the carbon of a zinc-carbon battery). [a, 27.]—Resinous e. Fr., électricité résineuse. Ger., Harzelectricität. The form of static e. generated by friction of a resinous body. [a, 27.]—Static e., Static e. Fr., électricité statique. Ger., statische Electricität. Syn.: franklinism. E. in a state of high tension, produced by friction, pressure, or cleavage, and accumulated on the surface of an insulated conductor, manifesting its presence by attractive force and the display of sparks, but not by the production of currents. Two kinds of static e. are distinguished: vitreous (or positive) e., and resinous (or negative) e., both being supposed to reside in equal amounts in non-electrified bodies, and to neutralize each other. When two dissimilar bodies are rubbed together, one of them becomes charged with resinous, the other with vitreous e., and this disturbance of electrical equilibrium gives rise to the phenomena of static e. Bodies charged with the same kind of static e. repel each other, those charged with opposite kinds attract each other, and any body charged with a single kind tends to regain its electrical equilibrium by withdrawing from surrounding bodies an equal quantity of the opposite kind of e. Static e. has recently been considerably used in medicine. [B, 21 26.]—Thermo-e. See the major list.—Unbound e. See FREE e.—Vitreous e. Fr., électricité vitrée. Absolute e. A standard galvanometer or ammeter. [a, 27.] See AMPEREMETER and MILLIAMPEREMETER.—Attracted disc e. See Quadrant e.—Capillary e. An instrument for measuring the intensity of an electric current, or more exactly the difference in the potential of its two electrodes. Lippmann's model is almost exclusively employed. It consists of a vertical tube drawn out to a point at its lower extremity and containing a column of mercury which descends into the narrow tubular part until it is arrested by capillary resistance. The point is plugged into a test-tube containing a layer of a dilute solution of sulphuric acid. By uniting the two bodies of mercury by a platinum wire, the capillary column becomes fixed in position, its lower meniscus representing the zero of the apparatus. The intensity of an electro-motor force interposed in the closed circuit can be measured by a micrometric reading of the extent of the upward or downward displacement of the inferior mercury meniscus. The displacement is due to the fact that the capillary constant of mercury when in contact with sulphuric acid varies with the electrical condition. [L, 87 (a, 27).]—Quadrant e. An instrument invented by W. Thomson to measure the potential of electricity of a body or the difference in the potentials of two bodies. It consists of a box composed of four equal horizontal and isolated metallic sectors, the diagonal members being coupled and of the same potential. A metallic plate is suspended by a wire in the centre of the box in such a manner that its axis is superposed upon one of the division lines of the sectors, to whose contours its own outlines are parallel. This plate is fully charged by means of a Leyden jar, but remains in repose so long as the sectors themselves are not charged. In order to determine the electrical condition of a given body, it is connected with one pair of quadrants, while the second pair communicates with the earth, and so is freed from tension. The current passing into the apparatus revolves the plate either to the right or to the left, according to whether the electricity is of the same or of a different kind from that with which the plate is charged. The amplitude and duration of the oscillation are limited by the resistance of the suspending wire, the time being proportional to the amplitude. By connecting a body with each quadrant couple in succession, the varying vibration of the plate will indicate the difference in their potentials. The plate is provided with a mirror that reflects the image of a scale to be read by means of a telescope. [B, 21, 270 (a, 27).]

The special expansion of a motor nerve-fibre at its termination in a striated muscular fibre. It consists of a medullated nerve, the primitive sheath of which becomes continuous with the sarcolemma of the muscle, while the axis-cylinder penetrates the sarcolemma, divides into numerous, often anastomosing branches, which spread out over the muscular substance. At the point of entrance of the axis-cylinder into the muscle-fibre there is usually an eminence formed by a granular nucleated mass, the appearance being as if many muscle corpuscles had become aggregated at this point. There are also many granular, nucleus-like masses situated along the twigs of the divided axis-cylinder. According to some investigators, the axis-cylinder is entirely outside the sarcolemma. According to Kühne, the motorial e.-p. is not the entire termination, but a clear space or substance between the granular mass and the axis-cylinder at the point where it penetrates the sarcolemma. By means of a screw arrangement the two discs may be fastened in their opposed position, and the degrees of the free sectors may be read off on a scale. The glass to be examined is then brought close to the disc, which is rapidly rotated like Masson's discs, so that a gray circle is produced. If we now look alternately through the disc and through the glass toward a white surface, we can, by displacement of the sectors of the first, equalize the diminution of the light produced by it with that produced by the glass. It has a peculiar heavy, disagreeable odor, and a mawkish, oily, rancid taste. Cocotrauch. A species indigenous to Peru, furnishing the official coca-leaves (Lat., coca [U. S. Ph.]; Fr., feuilles de coca; Ger., Cocablätter). The plant resembles a buckthorn-bush, from 6 to 8 feet in height, with straight branches, bright-green, oval, entire, coriaceous leaves, resembling tea-leaves, on each side of the midrib of which is a longitudinal vein. When chewed, they produce a sense of warmth, and have a pleasant pungent taste. The flowers are yellowish-white, and in little clusters on short stalks. They are succeeded by red berries. In Peru the Indians carry a pouch (chuspa) for the leaves, and a supply of unslaked lime, or the ashes of the quinoa plant (Chenopodium quinoa), called Uipta or Uucta. The leaves are chewed into a ball (acullicor), and a small quantity of the lime is then added, 2 or 3 oz. being used daily as a masticatory, which they assert enables them to labor and climb heights without fatigue or sense of hunger. It has been thus used from ancient times by the Peruvian Indians and is now used by the natives of South America to the number of 8,000,000. The leaves are considered useful in dyspepsia, constipation, colic, hypochondriasis, asthma, and diarrhæa. ETHER, n. E²thu²r. Fr., éther. Ger., Aether, Ester (2d and 3d def's). It., etere. Sp., éter. 1. Primarily, any medium of extreme tenuity. 2. In physics, a supposititious medium of extreme tenuity pervading all space, whose vibrations serve, according to the undulatory theory, for the transmission of luminous, thermal, and electrical impulses. 3. In chemistry (primarily), the substance called variously ethylic or sulphuric e., (C_2H_5)₂O (see ETHYLE'), which was also, at the time of its discovery, called ethereal spirit of wine, vitriolic e., naphtha, etc. The term has since been extended to all bodies of similar constitution to ethyle', (i. e., to all oxides of the monatomic hydrocarbons). E's in this sense consist of two univalent hydrocarbons united with one atom of oxygen. Their general formula, therefore, is $C_nH_{2n} + 1.C_mH_{2m} + 1.O$. If the two hydrocarbons are the same, the compound is called a simple e.; if they are dissimilar, the compound is a mixed e. A still further extension of the term is now made, so that it includes all compounds of the alcoholic radicles with an acid radicle, these being denominated compound e's. Compound e's formed by the union of the alcoholic radicles with one of the halogens are called haloid e's. The term e. is frequently restricted, especially when the word is coupled with an adjective, to the compound e's of ethyl. See Acetic e., Hydrobromic e., etc. The e. of the U. S. Ph. (Fr., ether à 758) is ethyl e. [B.]—Absolute e. E. which does not contain water. It is a colorless, limpid, permanent liquid of a strong refractive power, having a specific gravity of 0.710 at 20° C., a peculiar penetrating odor, and a sweetish, pungent taste. It is explosive, easily ignited, and burns with a bright flame, yielding water and carbonic acid. ETHYLAL, n. $E^{2th}i^{2l}a^{2l}$. Fr., éthylal. Ger., E. See ALDEHYDE.

ETHYL ALCOHOL, n. $E^{2th}i^{2l}a^{2l}ko^{2l}$. Lat., alcohol, spiritus, spiritus vini, aqua ardens, aqua vite. Fr., alcool, alcool éthylique, esprit de vin. Ger., Alkohol, Aethylalkohol, Weingeist. It., alcool, alcool etílico, alcoole. Sp., alcohol, alcohol etílico. Syn.: alcohol, spirit, spirit of wine. Hydrate or hydrated oxide of ethyl, $C_2H_5.OH = C_2H_5.OH$; a clear, colorless, mobile, very volatile and inflammable liquid of burning taste and peculiar pleasant ethereal odor, occurring in a dilute state in all beverages formed by the vinous fermentation of saccharine and starchy vegetable substances, and prepared in a pure state from these beverages by repeated distillation (rectification) and by dehydration with alkalies. It also occurs ready-formed in various vegetable substances, and occurs in coal-tar, bone-oil, and other products of organic distillation, as well as in bread. It has never been frozen, although at extremely low temperatures it becomes viscid. Boiling point, 78°3' C. Its sp. gr. varies greatly with the temperature, being 0.80625 at 0° C., 0.79367 at 15° C., 0.7809 at 30° C. It is very hygroscopic, and can not be freed by distillation alone from the moisture which it absorbs. It unites with various mineral salts, in the same manner that water does, to produce compounds, with one or more molecules of alcohol of crystallization. It is freely miscible with water, chloroform, ether, and benzene, and is a solvent for volatile oils, concrete oils (such as camphor), resins, phosphorus, iodine, bromine, and many other substances. On account of this solvent power it is largely employed in the arts and in pharmacy as a vehicle. Solutions of medicinal substances in e. a. are called tinctures and spirits. Locally, e. a., owing to its volatility, acts as a refrigerant, and when its evaporation is prevented, as an irritant and astringent, dehydrating moist surfaces, and coagulating albumin. Internally administered in moderate doses, it acts as a cardiac stimulant, particularly in cases of enfeebled cardiac action, but in excessive doses diminishes both the rapidity and force of the heart-beats. Small doses contract the arterioles (particularly in inflammatory conditions) and raise the blood-pressure and body temperature; large doses dilate the arterioles, diminish the blood-pressure, and lower the body temperature. Small doses likewise act as a stimulant to the gastric mucous membrane, the liver, and the cerebro-spinal centres, while large doses interfere with the functions of all of these organs. Applied in excessive or in continued doses, e. a. produces the condition called alcoholism (q. v.). E. a. is mostly eliminated unchanged by the lungs, kidney, and skin, but a small portion is oxidized in the body. E. a. is official in all of the pharmacopœias, the following table showing the various preparations extant, with their sp. gr. as given by the pharmacopœias. [B. 3, 10, 95, 97, 119.]

Of Röderer, that form of spontaneous evolution of the fetus in which the presenting shoulder is forced downward and imprisoned under the symphysis pubis. “The trunk having been enormously flexed, the head and thorax simultaneously enter the pelvic cavity, the former being deeply imbedded in the latter. The second arm and shoulder lie between the breech and thorax on the one hand, and the head on the other. The presenting shoulder having been expelled, the head and thorax are born together, and these are followed by the breech and the legs.” [A, 22.]—E. ex omnibus partibus. [Samuel (A, 319)].—Hypothesis of e. See Doctrine of e.—Pelvic spontaneous e. Fr., évolution spontanée pelvienne. Of Velpeau, that variety of spontaneous e. in which the pelvic pole descends. [A, 24].—Spontaneous e. Lat., evolutio spontanea. Fr., évolution spontanée. Ger., Selbstentwicklung. It., evoluzione spontanea. Sp., evolución espontánea. The natural expulsion of a fetus that presents transversely without the occurrence of spontaneous version. "The presenting shoulder is forced into the depths of the true pelvis by the violence of the uterine contractions, instead of being diverted laterally, as is the case in spontaneous version, and becomes firmly fixed beneath the symphysis, while the corresponding arm protrudes through the vulva. The body of the fetus is then so forcibly flexed that the breech and the head lie in close proximity to each other. The former is in contact with the sacro-iliac synchondrosis, while the latter is immovably held between the breech and the upper border of the symphysis. The neck and shoulder, which rest against the lower border of the symphysis, now become the pivot upon which the fetus rotates. The trunk of the fetus is driven beyond the shoulder, and the thorax, breech, and legs are born in the order named. The other shoulder then follows, and the head is finally expelled." This is the variety described by Douglas; for the other, see EVOLVITO CONDUPPLICATO CORPORA. Although the term "spontaneous expulsion" has been attributed to Douglas, he expressly says: "I wish to retain the appellation 'spontaneous evolution,' given by Dr. Denman to the event of a delivery, in arm presentation, unaided by the accoucheur; both because the fact is known by the term, and because it appears to me more suitable than that of expulsion." A cylindrical weight is suspended from the pan of a hydrostatic balance by means of a tube of the same volume as is itself. If when the weight is plunged into water the hollow is filled with the same, the equilibrium is exactly maintained. [B, 21 (a, 27).]

ping e. Fr., épreuve tombante. Ger., Fallversuch. A simple e. devised by Hering to show whether there is a normal binocular act of vision. A cylindrical tube, 25 cm. long, and wide enough to be looked through with both eyes, has at one end, and fastened on its outside, two long needles, which must be so bent outward that they can not be seen on looking through the tube. A fine silken thread connects the point of one needle with that of the other. Midway between the needles is a knot in the thread, or a small bead, which then lies in the centre of the field of vision of the tube. The tube is held close before the face, with the thread horizontal, and the patient looks through the tube with both eyes; the bead in the middle serves as a fixation point. Small balls of different sizes are allowed to fall about twelve times, one after the other, midway between the needles. One who sees binocularly can tell with certainty whether a ball falls within or beyond the fixation point, while one who perceives the retinal image of one eye only is frequently deceived. [F].—Embrace e. Ger., Umarmungsversuch. Stimulation of the skin overlying the sternum of a male frog deprived of its brain, so as to cause it to embrace reflexly the object used to produce the irritation. [Landois (K)].—Fechner's paradoxical e. Fr., épreuve paradoxale de Fechner. Ger., Fechner's paradoxer Versuch. An e. introduced by Fechner in the domain of the color-sense for the determination of binocular light-perception. In the case of most observers, when one eye is closed, Fechner found that at first there was a slight clouding of the common visual field, but this was quickly followed by an equal clearing up of the field. If the visual field of one eye is darkened by a gray glass held before the eye, and then the common visual field or a white object in it be regarded, the latter appears darker than when the eye behind the gray glass is entirely closed. [F].—Gellé's e.—An e. by which Gellé professes that a diagnosis can be made between affections of the middle ear and of the labyrinth. If the air in the meatus is condensed by means of a rarefying apparatus, the tone of a tuning-fork, brought into contact with the india-rubber tube or the bones of the head, will be decidedly weakened. If an obstacle to the conduction of sound exists, as in ankylosis of the stapes, according to Gellé, the tone remains unchanged during the e.; if, however, the labyrinth is affected and the stapes movable, at every condensation there will be a feeling of giddiness and noises in the ear, symptoms of an increase of pressure in the labyrinth. [F, 32].—Hering's e. See DROPPING e.—Kühne's e.—An e. to demonstrate the contractility of plasmodium by means of electricity. [a, 27].—Passive e.—An e. in which nature determines the conditions, the observer simply taking cognizance of what goes on.—Rinne's e.—An e. consisting in setting a tuning-fork (pitched in the bass C) on the vertex or mastoid process, and allowing it to vibrate till the note is no longer heard; the prongs of the fork are then brought close to the ear, and in normal circumstances the tone will be heard again. When this e. turns out positive, according to Luce, there is an affection of the internal ear. When it turns out negative, there is disturbance in the sound-conducting apparatus, though there may be a simultaneous affection of the nervous apparatus. [F, 32].—Schneider's e.—An e. for proving that the eye can not accommodate for a near and a distant object at the same time. It consists in fixing the gaze upon a small object, and then looking beyond it at some distant point. The image of the former then appears to be double and blurred. [K].—Torricelli's e.—An e. designed to demonstrate the amount of atmospheric pressure by means of a cistern barometer. [a, 27].—Valsalvian e.—The condensation of the air in the naso-pharynx by a strong act of expiration, performed with closed mouth and nostrils, thus driving the air up through the Eustachian tubes into the tympanic cavities and forcing the drum-membranes outward. [F.]

Breathing out, exhalation. 1. The act of expelling the air from the lungs. In ordinary tranquil breathing, e. is accomplished (a) by gravity and the elasticity of the thorax, both of which tend to bring the ribs back to the position occupied before inspiration; (b) by the elasticity of the lungs; (c) by the elasticity of the abdominal walls and viscera which arch the relaxed diaphragm back into the thorax. A method of hastening the expulsion of the fœtus during labor by rubbing, squeezing, and pressing upon the uterus. With the woman lying on her back, the obstetrician tries to displace any coils of intestine that may lie in front of the uterus; then he grasps the fundus in both hands, with the thumbs in front and the rest of the hands behind. Gentle friction is practised at first, increasing its force and directing it from above downward. This is continued from five to eight seconds, diminishing gradually, after the manner of the natural contractions. After an interval, varying from half a minute to three minutes, the manipulation is renewed, a fresh portion of the uterus being seized; and this is repeated ten, twenty, or forty times if necessary. A long, spindle-shaped muscle which arises from the external condyle of the humerus by a tendon common to it and the e. digitorum communis, between which and the e. carpi ulnaris it is placed. Its tendon passes through a separate compartment in the annular ligament, behind the inferior radio-ulnar articulation, and upon the back of the hand divides into two portions, the outermost of which is blended with the fourth tendon of the e. digitorum communis. The two portions expand into a broad aponeurosis, upon the dorsum of the little finger, which is inserted into the second and third phalanges in the same manner as the tendons of the e. digitorum communis. It is an e. of the little finger, and of the wrist upon the forearm. The number of tendons which are given off is uncertain. [L, 31, 142, 172, 332].—E. digiti quinti brevis. Fr., extenseur commun des doigts. Ger., gemeinschaftlicher Fingerstrecker. A long, flattish, round muscle which arises in a point from the external condyle of the humerus, the deep fascia and the adjacent intermuscular septa, and in the middle of the dorsum of the forearm divides into four bellies which become tendinous in the lower third of the forearm. The tendons pass through a compartment of the annular ligament on the back of the radius, and upon the carpus diverge to reach the index, middle, ring, and little fingers. Opposite each metacarpophalangeal articulation a thin slip is given off from each side. These form the posterior ligament of the joint, and are re-enforced by fasciculi from the lumbricales and interossei muscles, which make a fibrous expansion upon the dorsal surfaces of the first phalanges. The tendon divides into three slips, the middle one being inserted into the base of the second phalanx, the two lateral ones being continued along the sides of the second phalanx to unite into one tendon which is inserted upon the dorsum of the distal phalanx. The tendons of the index and little fingers are joined by those of their special e's before their division. Upon the dorsum of the hand the tendons are united to each other by cross-slips, that between the index and middle fingers being loose, while those on each side of the ring finger are more closely united, so that any great degree of independent motion of the middle or ring finger is prohibited. [L, 31, 142, 172, 332].—E. digitorum pedis. Ger., Streckmuskel der Zehen. See E. digitorum longus pedis.—E. digitorum pedis brevis. Fr., extenseur court des orteils. A muscle which arises from the outer side of the os calcis, the anterior annular, and the calcaneo-astragaloid ligaments and terminates in four tendons, the innermost of which is inserted into the first phalanx of the great toe, and the others into the outer sides of the tendons of the e. digitorum longus, going to the second, third, and fourth toes. [L, 31, 142, 332]. Cf. E. hallucis brevis.—E. digitorum pedis longus. Fr., long extenseur des orteils. Ger., gemeinschaftlicher langer Zehenstrecker. A long, flat muscle which arises from the external tuberosity of the tibia, the head and upper three fourths of the anterior surface of the fibula, the septa between itself and the adjacent muscles, the upper portion of the interosseous membrane, and the deep fascia. It divides into a varying number of tendons (three, four, or five) either just above the annular ligament or upon the dorsum of the foot, which, after subdividing into four tendons when the original number is less than four, are inserted into the second and third phalanges of the four outer toes. The fifth tendon, when it exists, is inserted upon the dorsal surface of the fifth metatarsal bone. The tendons become expanded over the first phalanges, being joined by tendinous processes from the lumbricales and interossei muscles, and divide into three portions, the central ones being inserted into the bases of the second phalanges, and the lateral ones, after uniting into one, into the bases of the third phalanges. The three inner tendons are each joined on the outer side by a tendon from the e. digitorum brevis. It extends the phalanges, and, after extension is executed, flexes the torsi upon the leg. [L. 31, 142, 172, 332.]—E. digitorum primus. See E. digitorum manus communis.—E. dorsi communis. A muscle arising by three heads or portions, which occupies nearly the whole of the posterior portion of the arm. Its long or middle head (the anconæus longus) arises as a flat tendon from the infra-glenoid tubercle and contiguous portions of the axillary border of the scapula, its external head (the anconæus brevis) is fleshy and tendinous and arises from the upper and outer part of the posterior surface of the humerus between the insertion of the teres minor and the groove for the musculo-spiral nerve, and from the external intermuscular septum, where it forms an arch over the upper portion of the groove, and its internal or deep head (the anconæus internus) arises from the posterior surface of the humerus, between the groove for the musculo-spiral nerve and a point about an inch above the trochlear surface and the internal and external intermuscular septa. It is inserted into the back part of the upper surface of the olecranon by the common tendon which commences at about the middle of the arm as two aponeurotic layers, the one subcutaneous and the other situated in the substance of the muscle. The muscular fibres of the different heads are inserted into these layers, which unite just above the olecranon to form a single tendon. It extends the forearm upon the arm and renders the fascia of the forearm tense. [L. 31, 142, 172, 332.]

EXTRACTIO (Lat.), n. f. E²x-tra²kt(=tra²kt)sh'i²(=ti²)-o. Gen., extractio'is. See EXTRACTION and EXTRACT.

EXTRACTION, n. E²x-tra²kt'shu²n. Gr., ἐξελκυσμός, ἐξαγωγή. Lat., extractio (from ex, out, and trahere, to draw). Fr., e. Ger., E., Ausziehen. It., estrazione. Sp., extracción. A drawing out, as of a tooth, a hair, the crystalline lens, a foreign body, etc.; in obstetrics, the manual or instrumental removal of the foetus, especially by the pelvis pole; in pharmacy, the process of making an extract.—Cataract e. The operation of extracting a cataract. Aaser's method is the same as Schmidt's (vide infra). Dart's method is a so-called modification of the original Daviel's operation in which the flap in the cornea is made by a single incision with a knife, without the aid of scissors. Beer's method is the typical corneal flap operation, made with Beer's triangular knife (the edge of the blade being the hypotenuse), and the incision being made downward, followed by free capsulotomy and the extrusion of the lens without iridectomy. Beer's flap-e. without capsulotomy is an operation in which the corneal section is made downward in the usual manner with a Beer's knife, the lens is then split on the needle, and then (by lateral movements of the needle from above downward and from right to left, accompanied by a rotatory motion) the lens in its capsule is detached from the zonula and extracted. Berenger's method is a modification of Daviel's operation in which the corneal section is made with a single instrument (a knife), no scissors being employed to enlarge the wound. Boroman's modified linear e. is an operation in which a broad lance-knife is employed, the section being made in the sclero-corneal margin, and lengthened during the withdrawal of the lance-knife. The iridectomy is made upward, the capsule lacerated, and the lens removed by a spoon resembling Critchett's rather than Waldau's. Bribosia's operation is one in which two modifications of the peripheral linear operation are proposed. The capsule is first lacerated through the cornea by a stop-needle. The narrow knife is then introduced, and, as it is passed across the anterior chamber, rotated slightly so as to cause a prolapse, upon the knife, of the iris, which is thus excised. Carter's operation is one in which the knife recommended is 30 mm. long, 2 mm. broad, and very thin. The points of entrance and exit are just behind the margin of the cornea, on a line 2 mm. below the horizontal tangent. The incision is completed by a series of gently drawing cuts, and the rotation of the edge forward should be sufficient to make the centre of the incision correspond exactly with the sclero-corneal junction, so that its whole track will lie in a plane less oblique than and anterior to the plane of Von Graefe's section. There may or may not be made a conjunctival flap. The iridectomy is then made in the usual way. Then the anterior capsule is incised with a double beam-shaped cystotome, and a quadrangular piece of capsule removed. The cataract is then caused to extrude by gentle pressure and counterpressure. Christeau's operation consists in removing the lens in its capsule by pressure upon the upper lid after the incision in the cornea has been made in the usual manner in the limbus. Critchett's operation is a modification of Von Graefe's peripheral operation, in which the puncture and counterpuncture are made in the sclerotic at a distance of 1 mm. from the edge of the cornea, and 3 mm. below its upper tangent, and the knife is brought out through the sclerotic immediately above the cornea. Critchett's modified linear e. is an operation in which the section is made in the cornea upward within the limbus with a broad lance-knife, and then the wound is enlarged in both directions with a pair of blunt-pointed scissors. An iridectomy upward is then made, and the capsule lacerated. The spoon employed is shallower and with a blunter edge than the spoon of Waldau. The corneal section is more like a fissure than a flap-wound. Daviel's flap-e. is an operation in which an incision in the cornea is made with a pointed lance-knife, and the wound enlarged with a myrtle-shaped lance-knife, and later with two pairs of scissors, one curved on the flat, and the other on the edge. The anterior capsule is then freely opened in various directions, and the lens then extruded by slight pressure on the eye with a spoon. Desmarres's operation is for shrunken capsular cataracts, devised in 1847. It resembles Sichel's operation through the sclerotic, except for the use of a strong pair of forceps, with arms 4 to 5 mm. long. Earle's cataract e. through the sclerotic is an operation in which a small lancet, moving backward and forward between the blades of a pair of forceps, is employed. This instrument being introduced into the sclera, the lancet is withdrawn by means of a spring within the handle, the blades of the forceps are opened, and the cataract seized and extracted. The incision should form a line perpendicular to the edge of the cornea. Gibson's simple linear cataract e. is an operation, advised in 1811, consisting in extracting a capsular cataract through a simple corneal incision by means of a hook. Gibson's operation for soft cataract is one in which the anterior capsule was first freely lacerated with a needle, and then in the course of a few weeks the cornea was opened through a small incision near its temporal edge, a curette introduced as far as the pupil, and the lens thus evacuated by means of gentle pressure. Gioppi's peripheral modified linear cataract e. is an operation in which a peripheral linear section is made upward, as in Von Graefe's operation, and the lens in its capsule is removed with a spoon-shaped instrument resembling Waldau's spoon. There is no iridectomy, and no laceration of the capsule. Jacobson's modified flap-e. is an operation in which the corneal section is made in the sclero-corneal margin, the lens and capsule are extracted in the usual manner, and finally the segment of iris which has been pressed upon by the lens in its extrusion, excised. Jaeger's flap-e. is an operation in which the corneal incision is made upward, as recommended by Wenzel in 1786. In other respects it is the same as Beer's operation. Jaeger's peripheral modified linear cataract e. is an operation in which the incision is made with a knife, shaped like a Beer's knife, one surface of which is concave, and the other convex, the latter being turned toward the eyeball. The section is made upward, the points of entrance and exit being 3.5 mm. below the apex of the corneal base, and lying in the sclera about 2.5 mm. from the corneal margin. The knife is pressed steadily forward in making the section, just as the ordinary Beer's knife is employed. The capsule is then opened freely, and the lens extruded. No iridectomy is done. Jaeger's simple linear cataract e. is an operation resembling Gibson's, in which an ordinary iris-hook is used. Küchler's cataract e. by horizontal incision is an operation in which a transverse section is made across the middle of the cornea, in its horizontal diameter, and after extracting the lens through this opening, immobilizing the eyelids by enveloping the whole head and face in a sort of helmet of plaster-of-Paris bandage, which was not removed for several days. Lafayé's flap-e. consisted in making the corneal wound a curve, and using only one instrument, which was a knife shaped something like a scalpel. Landrau's modified flap-e. is the same as Schmidt's. Lebrun's corneal-flap-e. resembles Liebreich's, except that the two ends of the incision lie in the cornea within the limbus, and about one mm. below the horizontal meridian. The section is made upward, and its apex lies at the point of limitation between the upper and middle thirds of the vertical corneal meridian. The blade of the knife is gradually rotated during the section, making at first an angle of 30° with the base of the cornea and ending at almost a right angle. The capsule is then lacerated, and the lens extracted by gentle pressure, without an iridectomy. Liebreich's corneal-flap-e. is one in which the section lies in the lower half of the cornea so that the apex of the slightly curved incision is placed about two mm. above the lower corneal margin. It is made with a very narrow Graefe knife. The plane of the blade should form an angle of 45° with the horizontal meridian of the cornea. The points of entrance and exit lie in the scleral margin, one mm. from the corneal margin and about two mm. below the horizontal meridian. No iridectomy is made, but the capsule is immediately opened and the lens extracted by gentle pressure. Macnamara's operation is an e. of the lens in the capsule without an iridectomy, by means of a large, straight, triangular keratome. With this a large incision is made just within the margin of the cornea, on the outer side. A scoop is then inserted through the wound as far as the outer edge of the pupil, having reached which its handle is raised so as to bring the lower end into contact with the capsule of the lens. The scoop is then slightly withdrawn, but so as to draw open the pupil far enough for pressure to be made on the edge of the lens with the rounded end of the scoop. This causes the lens to tilt over in front of the scoop, and both are then withdrawn. Mooren's modified flap-e. is an operation which consists in making a preliminary iridectomy several weeks before the operation, so as to avoid the dangers incident to hæmorrhage or the possibilities of a suppurative iritis. The operation is then done in the usual manner, and the lens in its capsule extracted either by pressure or with the spoon. Pagenstecher's modified flap-e. is an operation for the removal of the lens in its capsule. Pagenstecher employed complete anaesthesia, and made his corneal flap downward with the incision back in the sclero-corneal limbus. He then excised a piece of iris, and then by pressure on the eyeball through the closed upper lid endeavored to cause extrusion of the lens in its capsule by rupture of the zonula. If this proved unsuccessful, he opened the canal of Petit below and introduced a small spoon below and behind the lens, and lifted it out. More recently, he has advised making the Graefe peripheral linear incision with iridectomy. Pagenstecher's peripheral modified linear e. consists in removing the lens and its capsule at the same time. The section is a peripheral one, resembling somewhat the incision of Von Graefe, though having somewhat more of a flap-wound, and the iridectomy is made upward. The section is best made with a straight, narrow knife. Palucci's simple linear e. is an operation devised in 1750 which consists in extracting lens and capsule through the usual corneal incision by means of a fine forceps. Richter's flap-e. is a modification of Daviel's operation, consisting merely in the use of a single instrument (a knife), in completing the corneal incision. Rosa's flap-e. is an operation in which the corneal incision is made upward, but in all other respects the same as Beer's. Santarelli's simple linear e. was an operation (employed from 1795 to 1810 for all forms of cataract) in which the corneal incision was made with a broad lance-knife with curved surface, near its upper margin, and the capsule opened at the same time with the point of the knife. The lens was then extruded by pressure. Schmidt's flap-e. consists in a simple puncture of the vitreous humor through the posterior capsule or hyaloid membrane (after the lens has been extracted in the ordinary way), in order to overcome the collapse of the cornea which frequently occurs in this operation. All the other steps are precisely as in the ordinary Beer's operation. Sharp's flap-e. is almost exactly similar to Lafayé's. Sichel's cataract e. through the sclerotic was devised in 1840 for the e. of shrunken cataracts. The incision is made through the sclerotic with a lance-knife, and the cataract extracted with a fine forceps. Steffan's modified flap-e. is an operation in which the points of entrance and exit of the knife, in making the corneal section, lie about one mm. within the corneal margin, so as to make the incision long enough for the extraction of large, hard cataracts. An iridectomy is then made, the capsule opened freely, and the lens extruded by pressure on the upper lid. Taylor's cataract e. is an operation in which it is proposed to combine the benefits of iridectomy with the preservation of the integrity of the pupil. An incision is made in the corneal margin, the iris is separated for a corresponding distance from its ciliary attachment, and the lens is then pressed out through the peripheral opening thus made. After this operation, the detached portion of iris falls slightly, but this forms but a slight blemish. Teale's operation by suction was devised in 1864. Teale invented an instrument which consisted of a fine, somewhat curved tube of metal, a piece of rubber-tubing, and a glass mouth-piece. The cornea was first opened by a broad needle, and the capsule freely lacerated. A curette was then passed into the lens-mass, and connected with the suction apparatus, and the lens matter removed by aspiration. Travers's simple linear e. is an operation in which the usual corneal incision is made, and the anterior capsule opened with the point of the knife, when by gentle pressure and counter-pressure the lens is caused to present at the corneal wound and is removed with a curette or spoon. He at first advised preliminary dislocation of the cataract into the anterior chamber. Von Graefe's peripheral modified linear e. is an operation in which the knife employed is 2 mm. wide, 3.5 cm. long, and very thin. This should puncture the sclera 1.5 mm. from the corneal margin, enter and cross the anterior chamber, and the counter-puncture should be in the sclera, on the opposite side, at an equal distance from the corneal margin. The direction of the blade should be such that its back is turned toward the centre of curvature of the anterior surface of the cornea. The edge then appears as a curved line which corresponds to the greatest circle of the corneal surface. By a to-and-fro, sawing motion, the section is then completed upward. Externally the distance between the point of entrance and point of exit should measure 11 mm. in a straight line. A broad iridectomy is then made, which may or may not be as broad as the section is long. The capsule is then to be opened freely, either by a straight incision, or a crucial incision, or a quadrilateral incision, with a cystotome or hook. In the original operation they introduced Daviel's spoon inside the capsule and removed the lens entire. Waldau's modified linear e. is one in which an incision is made in the cornea, with a lance-headed keratome, half a line from its junction with the sclerotic and embracing one fourth of its circumference; a portion of iris is excised; the capsule of the lens is lacerated freely with a cystotome; a silver spoon is inserted into the corneal incision, and glided along the posterior surface of the lens, between it and its capsule; the lens is then within the bowl of the spoon, and the latter with the lens is slowly and carefully withdrawn from the eye. The spoon employed is something like a shovel in shape, and four sizes are used. Weber's peripheral modified linear e. is an operation done with a broad concave lance- or heart-shaped knife, bent at an angle of 120° with the shaft, the concavity being on the posterior surface. The section is made preferably downward in the base of the cornea. When an iridectomy is deemed necessary, the excision should be confined to the pupillary margin of the iris, and it is better to use an iris-hook than a forceps. The capsule is then to be extensively lacerated, especially in a transverse direction. The wound is then made to gape by a gentle steady pressure and counter-pressure, and the lens is extracted. Wenzel's flap-e. at first consisted in making the corneal flap upward, but subsequently he recommended a lateral incision in the cornea, so that the flap was directed outward toward the external canthus. The supposed advantages of this modification are purely imaginary. Williams's operation consists in making a typical classical flap-e. without an iridectomy, going through each step in the ordinary way. Then when the lens has been extruded, a single point of very fine suture is inserted at the apex of the corneal flap by means of a straight needle, less than one fourth of an inch long, with a flat cutting point. A single strand of the finest silk is employed for the suture, the edges of the wound being held with very fine, toothed forceps. The suture is left in for a week, and should then be removed under ether. [F. 2, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69; Liebreich, "Med. Times and Gaz.," 1871 (F); Sharp, "Phil.
